Wonderful

munity:

"William Lincoln Curtis is the name of the young man in question. He is now employed at H. K. Porter & Co.'s locomotive works in Pittsburgh, Pa. A year ago he resided with his mother on Grant street. About that time he went to bed one evening with a violent pain in his shoulder, the result, he thought, of a cold. The next morning the shoulder was greatly swollen, the pain was intense, and aches were felt all through his system. His case was speedily developed into a violent form of chronic rheumatism, among the first notable features of which was the paralysis of his left arm.

"He gradually grew worse, and in a few months the ellow and knee joints and both ankles became enormously enlarged. In March last the check bones began to enlarge, and upon his left side particularly, spreading his face out of all resemblance to his former self. The pain in all his joints became intense, fever, with its deteriorating effects, was now added, and he became rapelly reduced to the semblance of a skeleton, while vitality reached its lowest possible condition, and his sufferings were of such as indiscribable characteritat thoseaswho most loved him sometimes thought it would be better if he was called away. At this time

PRINCE CHARMING.

It had been a busy day at the farm. A ot, sweltering day, with not a breath of air stirring to cool the heated brows of the men working like Trojans in the field over there to garner the ripened grain ere the heavy thunder storm which had been threatening all that long, sultry afternoon, should burst above them.

"What a life!" muttered Myra Floyd ontemptuously, as she came from the large, clean, cheery look ng kitchen, and ope of finding a cooling breeze. "Hot, resome, monotonous! The same dispiriting routine of work, the same familiar, never changing scanes. Bah! I'm sick of to heaven I could get away from it forever!"

Her dark, restless eyes glanced away over the well kept garden just below the porch, across the "meadow tot," and the wide, white, dusty read, a little further on to the sun-scorched fields beyond, which the toilers were just leaving for the welcome repose of the farm house and the bountiful supper which Myra's busy hands had prepared.

An expression very like disgust swept across the girl's pretty brunette face and curled her daintily curved crimson lips. She knew just how they would look when they did come in—tired, warm and dusty, but still jovial—and Myra ielt that she could not listen patiently to their sallies of homely, good-matured wit this evening.

She was in just that mood wheneverything connected with her daily life seemed utterly distasteful, and really it was no great wonder. It was hard work—though she had a good, strong girl to assist her—to keep the house neat and shining as it always was, and to cook for these hungry harvesters—especially on days like this, when a stri would have enough to do one lark when a stri would have enough to do one was head a stri would have enough to do one lark when a stri would have enough to do one lark when a stri would have enough to do one lark when a stri would have enough to do one lark where she had been an astonished when a girl would have enough to do, one might suppose, in simply lying under the friendly shade of some big tree with her favorite novel in her hand, trying to keep cool.

Beside, it was so insufferably dull!—no place to go evenings, nobody to show one any agreeable attentions, except—but there! Myra was not in a mood to wish to remember the pleasant features of her country life, so she resolutely refused to think of Matt. Sedgewick and the charmings they had spent together, when, with his handsome face and delightfully entertaining ways, he had made the long hours in the country seem like glimpses of an earthly Paradise.

But then, after all, Matt. Sedgewick was farmer, and she, Myra, signed for a life looking of and exact almost stoopped beating as he approached and gracefully raised his hat. "Pardon, miss," he began politely; "I am driven by the threatening storm to seek shelter somewhere for an hour or so—or until it is over. May I beg the privilege of remaining here? It would be hard to find a pleasanter refuge, I am sure."

And he glanced admiring over the nest gardan and vine-draped porch. But his handsome dark eyes came back, and owell upon Myra's pretty face with a smile in their velvety depths which told her clearly that the charm of the place to him was her own presence there.

In spite of herself she trembled and blushed consciously as she sastered him he would be welcome, and ross to give him each air.

"Here is father now," she said, thrilling under the magnetic gaze of those dark eyes which seemed loth to leave her face. "Father, this gentleman wend like to waither until the storm is over," she added, as the little band of harvestmen filed cheerly through the garden gate.

"All right, sir, you'rs welcome. Make yerself at home," said Farmer Floye, shiff, hearty man, directing his hospitable answer to the stranger instead of his daughter. "The storm, hey?" he continued, glancing critically toward the heavens. "Genes 'tain't for off, sure enouth. Well, let'er come," contented by. "Ve've get the srain stacked and under cover, so I don't keer, how soon it busts. Supper ready, Myrn?"

"Yes, father," she answered, leading the way into the cool, testeful dining room, where a most inviting repast awaited the hongy men.

The stranger was cordially invited to join them, and he proved a most enteriaining addition to the little circle. They had scarcely seaded themselves when the storm "boxt" with a vengeance, but no body seemed to mind it. Myra's discontent was all gone now, and also and men "her in the stranger was cordially invited to join them, and he proved a most enteriaining addition to the little circle. "There! You don't know what I was saying. Don't make a useless effort to recall what you didn't bear," he retorted, with some anger in his voice. "Myra," suddenly, as he laid his hand upon her arm, "tell me the truth, hasn't that stranger, Hayden, a good deal to do in the change in your manner, so noticeable of late?"

"Nonsense, Matt, what an idea!" she exclaimed reproschfully, but the dark, restless eyes took care not to meet his. It would be hard to evade the truth with those tender, compelling blue eyes gasing straight into her own.
"Sometimes I almost believe it," he answered slowly, and still unconvinced.
"Oh, Myra, for your own sake beware of him! Something tells me that he hards sense. Matt, what an idea!" she

"Nonsense, Matt!" Myra said again, with a little nervous laugh. But she hastened to change the subject, and managed to be more like her old self, as the strolled homeward down the lane.

But all this time she was wondering what he would say if he knew that some one—no other than Prince Charming—would be awaiting her at toe further end of the lane, and that she had given her solemn promise to fly from home with

Yes, it had come to that. Time and again the fascinaling stranger, Oscar Hayden, had taken the farm house in his course when "doing" the places of interest in the neighborhood of the village where he was summering.

Occasionally he encountered Matt Sedgewick there, and then the accomplished man of the world had only a courteous bow or smile of friendly recognition for the young beauty, for a subtle instinct warned him that it would not be well for should that blue-eyed, broad-ahouldered young gentleman farmer get an inkling of his real designs.

young gentleman larmer get an inking of his read designs.

But when he found Myra alone, as he often did, then were his ready words of delicate fattery and long, tender interviews which the young gri treasured up in her heart and dreamed over until her foolish infatuation was complete.

"By the way, you haven't told me how that rustic fliration of yours is progressing, eh, Hayden ?"

"Oh, finely, if you mean the one with old Floyd's pretty daughter." lightly answered a voice which thrilled their listener—no other than Myra Floyd herself—with such horrified amazement that she almost screamed aloud, for the voice was that of her city lover, Oscar Hayden. "The little beauty is completely under my influence—she loves me to distraction."

"And how is it going to end, old fellow; seriously or otherwise?" pursued his questioner, and there was a spice of genuine curiosity in the half-laughing, masculine tones.

"Otherwise of course so far as I am

And when he did he took the foolish heart of Myra with him.

Standing in the flower-scented porch, with wet vine leaves overhead and the low breeze signing around them, he whispered a tender good night and held Myra's hand while he asked and received permission to come again.

And that was how Prince Charming came into her life.

"What is the matter with you this morning, Myra'? I don't believe you have heard one word that I have said to you in the last ten minutes."

And Matt Sedgewick stopped abruptly in the path—they were strolling together.
